Decides as follows:

THE FACTS

The facts of the case, as they have been submitted by the applicant, may be summarised as follows:

The applicant, born in 1960, is a German national and resident at R.. He is a student. Before the Commission he is respresented by Mr. R. Schmid, a lawyer practising at Nagold.

On 3 August 1983 the Stuttgart District Court (Amtsgericht) acquitted the applicant of the charge of having committed unlawful coercion (Nötigung) under S. 240 of the German Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch).

S. 240 of the Criminal Code provides:

<German>

"(1) Wer einen anderen rechtswidrig mit Gewalt oder durch Drohung mit einem empfindlichen Übel zu einer Handlung, Duldung oder

Unterlassung nötigt, wird mit Freiheitsstrafe bis zu drei Jahren oder mit Geldstrafe, in besonders schweren Fällen mit Freiheitsstrafe von sechs Monaten bis zu fünf Jahren bestraft.

(2) Rechtswidrig ist die Tat, wenn die Anwendung der Gewalt oder die Androhung des Übels zu dem angestrebten Zweck als verwerflich anzusehen ist.

(3) Der Versuch ist strafbar."

<Translation>

"(1) Anybody who coerces another to do something, tolerate something or omit to do something by force or dangerous threats shall be punished with imprisonment up to three years or a fine, in specially aggravated cases with imprisonment from six months to five years.

(2) The act shall be unlawful only if the application of the force or the dangerous threat to the desired end is blameworthy.

(3) An attempt is punishable."

The District Court found that the applicant had participated in a demonstration in front of the US military barracks on 12 December 1982 on the occasion of the third anniversary of the NATO Twin-Track Agreement (NATO-Doppelbeschluß). The demonstrators had blocked the road to the barracks every full hour for a period of twelve minutes. During these sit-ins the traffic had been closed by US military forces and the police. The applicant had participated in one blockade at about 11.58 hours. The police had ordered that the demonstrators should leave the road. The applicant and other demonstrators who did not comply with this order were then carried away. At 12.06 hours the road was again opened for traffic.

The District Court considered that, in the particular circumstances of the present case, the blockades did not even cause mental duress (psychische Zwangseinwirkung) on persons who wanted to pass on the road and did not, therefore, constitute unlawful use of force within the meaning of S. 240 para. 2 of the Criminal Code.

Furthermore, the District Court considered that the applicant did not commit a "regulatory offence" (Ordnungswidrigkeit) under the Assembly Act (Versammlungsgesetz) in that he did not comply with the order of the police authorities to leave the road. The District Court in this respect found that the sit-in had not been dispersed by the competent department of the police authorities.

On 23 December 1983 the Stuttgart Regional Court (Landgericht), upon the appeal (Berufung) of the Public Prosecutor's Office (Staats-anwaltschaft), quashed the judgment of 3 August 1983. Having held trial, it convicted the applicant of attempted coercion under S. 240 of the Criminal Code and fined him DM 100 (10 day-rates of DM 10).

The Regional Court found in particular that the sit-ins on the approach road to the US military barracks in Stuttgart constituted coercion by force within the meaning of S. 240 of the Criminal Code. They intended to prevent any driver from using the road during the periods concerned.

Furthermore, the Regional Court considered that this use of force was unlawful within the meaning of S. 240 para. 2 of the Criminal Code. The organisers of the demonstration had not requested prior authorisation for the demonstration under the relevant provision of the German Assembly Act (Versammlungsgesetz). The different peace groups and their members participating in the sit-ins intended to draw public attention to their goals, namely resistance and a fight against nuclear armament by unlawful means. They deliberately interfered with the rights of others. Such agitation was not covered by the right to peaceful assembly. Moreover, the action taken was not justified as a measure necessary in a state of emergency (übergesetzlicher Notstand). The risks of nuclear armament could not be eliminated by blocking an approach road to US military forces. However, the offence had not been completed on the ground that the drivers who wanted to use the road in question were in fact already beforehand stopped by the German police or members of the US military forces.

On 25 July 1984 the Stuttgart Court of Appeal (Oberlandesgericht) dismissed the applicant's appeal on points of law (Revision).

On 11 November 1986, upon hearings on 15 and 16 July 1986 concerning the applicant's and joined cases, the Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht) dismissed the applicant's constitutional complaint (Verfassungsbeschwerde). It could not find a violation of the Basic Law due to equality of votes.

In its very detailed judgment of 57 pages, the Constitutional Court observed that the legal opinions in jurisprudence and doctrine as regards sit-ins were divergent. It found that the definition of unlawful coercion in S. 240 of the Criminal Code was sufficiently concrete and did not violate the requirements of legal certainty (Bestimmtheitsgebot), as derived from Article 103 para. 2 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz). However, the application and interpretation of S. 240 of the Criminal Code by the German courts could raise problems with regard to the prohibition of defining crimes by analogy with existing offences (Analogieverbot), also derived from Article 103 para. 2 of the Basic Law.

Article 103 para. 2 of the Basic Law provides that an act can be punished only if it was an offence against the law before the act was committed.

The Federal Constitutional Court noted that the term "force" in S. 240 para. 1 of the Criminal Code was initially interpreted as use of physical force by the offender in order to overcome actual or probable resistance (Entfaltung von körperlicher Kraft durch den Täter zur Überwindung eines geleisteten oder erwarteten Widerstands). In subsequent cases the Federal Court of Justice (Bundesgerichtshof) held that there was also "use of force where the offender acts in such a way as to cause the victim's resistance (actual or probable) to be overcome by an agent acting directly on the victim, the amount of physical force used being irrelevant" ("Gewalt liegt auch vor, wenn der Täter durch körperliche Handlungen die Ursache dafür setzt, daß der wirkliche oder erwartete Widerstand des Angegriffenen durch ein unmittelbar auf dessen Körper einwirkendes Mittel gebrochen oder verhindert wird, gleichviel, ob der Täter dazu größere oder nur geringere Körperkraft braucht"). Finally, in a decision of 1969 concerning sit-ins, the Federal Court of Justice considered to be decisive that there was "an effect which inevitably influenced the victim's freedom to decide or to turn ideas into actions" ("eine die Freiheit der Willensentschließung oder Willensbetätigung beeinträchtigende Zwangswirkung"); it was "sufficient that the offender, with only a minimal expenditure of energy, set up a process which acted conclusively on the victim's mind, thereby compelling him to act in a particular way" ("es genügt, daß der Täter mit nur geringem Kraftaufwand einen lediglich psychisch determinierten Prozeß in Lauf setzt und dadurch einen unwiderstehlichen Zwang auf den Genötigten ausübt").

Four judges of the Constitutional Court found that the application of S. 240 of the Criminal Code to sit-ins such as in the present case was incompatible with the prohibition of defining crimes by analogy to existing offences under Article 103 para. 2 of the Basic law. The progressively broader interpretation of the term "force" under S. 240 of the Criminal Code had not been foreseeable for the citizen. The context of S. 240 para. 1 clearly indicated that not any coercion was deemed to be punishable, but only coercion by "force" or "dangerous threats". They considered that the participants in the sit-ins in question did not use force, but, after sitting down on the road, they remained completely passive. Moreover, it had not been established that any driver had felt compelled to stop by the sit-ins.

In the opinion of the four other judges the broad interpretation by German courts of the term "force" in S. 240 para. 1 of the Criminal Code cannot be objected to under constitutional law. It observed the limits of the ordinary sense of the term "force" as long as an expenditure of energy in the process of compelling the victim was required. Furthermore, having regard to the jurisprudence of the German courts in such matters, the risk of penalty for behaviour such as in the present case was foreseeable.

Furthermore, the Constitutional Court unanimously found that an act of "coercion by force" in the broad interpretation of S. 240 para. 1 of the Criminal Code should, however, not automatically be considered unlawful. The unlawfulness had to be established separately under S. 240 para. 2. The judges disagreed about whether sit-ins were "blameworthy".

Four of the judges found that sit-ins such as in the present case, which intended to force public attention towards protest against nuclear armament, were in principle not blameworthy.

The four other judges found that the application of S. 240 para. 2 of the Criminal Code, notably the assessment of the particular circumstances of a case, were the task of the criminal courts. The conviction in the present case did not arbitrarily disregard any constitutional right. The right to peaceful assembly under Article 8 of the Basic Law would not justify sit-ins which aimed principally at obstructing the traffic and were lawfully dispersed by the police. Furthermore sit-ins could not be justified as measures of "civil disobedience" ("ziviler Ungehorsam"), i.e. sensational action in breach of law (aufsehenerregende Regelverletzung) in order to protest against national policy.

In the meantime, the applicant had instituted administrative court proceedings against a cost order of the Stuttgart II Police Department (Landespolizeidirektion) of 31 January 1983 concerning the police action on 12 December 1982. On 5 November 1985 the Stuttgart Administrative Court (Verwaltungsgericht) decided that the cost order was unlawful on the ground that the dispersal of the demonstration on 12 December had been unlawful. The Court found in particular that the police forces which had ordered that the demonstration in question be dispersed were not competent under the relevant rules on the organisation of the police. The Administrative Court considered that, under the circumstances of the present case, it was not prevented from examining the order of dispersal in the context of the proceedings concerning the subsequent cost order, although the applicant had not instituted administrative court proceedings to challenge the lawfulness of this measure under S. 113 para. 1 fourth sentence of the German Code of Administrative Court Procedure (Verwaltungsgerichtsordnung).

COMPLAINTS

1. The applicant complains under Article 7 of the Convention that his participation in the demonstration and the sit-in in front of the US military barracks in Stuttgart did not constitute a criminal offence under German penal law but was defined, by analogy to the criminal offence of "coercion by force", under S. 240 of the Criminal Code.

2. The applicant also complains under Article 11 of the Convention that the action taken by the German police authorities in dispersing the demonstration on 12 December 1982 and his conviction for coercion violates his right to freedom of peaceful assembly. He submits in particular that the dispersal of the sit-in had been unlawful under German law. He refers in that respect to the decision of the Stuttgart Administrative Court dated 5 November 1985.

3. The applicant moreover invokes Article 14 of the Convention in respect of the above complaints. He submits that the prosecution of members of the peace movement discriminates against them on the ground of political opinion.

THE LAW

1. The applicant complains under Article 7 (Art. 7) of the Convention that his conviction by the Stuttgart Regional Court on 23 December 1983 for his participation in a sit-in was based on an unlawful analogy to the existing crime of coercion by force under S. 240 of the German Criminal Code.

Article 7 para. 1 (Art. 7-1) of the Convention reads as follows:

"No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence under national or international law at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the criminal offence was committed."

In the sphere of criminal law Article 7 para. 1 (Art. 7-1) of the Convention confirms the general principle that legal provisions which interfere with individual rights must be adequately accessible, and formulated with sufficient precision to enable the citizen to regulate his conduct (cf. Eur. Court H.R., Sunday Times judgment of 26 April 1979, Series A No. 30, p. 31, para. 49). Article 7 para. 1 (Art. 7-1) of the Convention prohibits in particular that existing offences be extended to cover facts which previously clearly did not constitute a criminal offence. This implies that constituent elements of an offence may not be essentially changed by the case-law of the domestic courts. It is not objectionable that the existing elements of the offence are clarified and adapted to new circumstances which can reasonably be brought under the original concept of the offence (cf. No. 8710/79, Dec. 7.5.82, D.R. 28 p. 77).

The Commission notes that the applicant was acquitted of the charge of coercion under S. 240 of the Criminal Code by the Stuttgart District Court. Upon the appeal of the Public Prosecutor's Office, the Stuttgart Regional Court convicted the applicant of attempted coercion by force. The Regional Court found in particular that the applicant, who had participated in a sit-in on 12 December 1982, attempted to coerce others by "force" not to use the road concerned. The Federal Constitutional Court, in its detailed judgment of 11 November 1986, referred to the jurisprudence of the German penal courts which had progressively developed the interpretation of the term "force" in the context of S. 240 of the Criminal Code. The Constitutional Court did not find a violation of the Basic Law due to equality of votes as regards, inter alia, the question whether or not this jurisprudence violated the prohibition against defining crimes by analogy to existing offences.

The Commission considers that the progressively broader interpretation of the term "force" within the context of S. 240 of the Criminal Code, which covers, inter alia, sit-ins as in the applicant's case, has adapted the offence of "unlawful coercion by force" to new circumstances and developments in society which can still reasonably be brought under the original concept of the offence. The applicability of S. 240 of the Criminal Code to sit-ins was clarified by the Federal Court of Justice in 1969 and, although the legal opinions remained divergent in this respect, the applicant could thus clearly foresee the risk of punishment for his participation in the sit-in of 12 December 1982.

Consequently, the Commission finds that there is no appearance of a violation of Article 7 para. 1 (Art. 7-1) of the Convention. It follows that the applicant's complaint in this respect is manifestly ill-founded within the meaning of Article 27 para. 2 (Art. 27-2) of the Convention.

2. Furthermore, the applicant complains that his conviction by the Stuttgart Regional Court on 23 December 1983 for his participation in one of the sit-ins violated his right to freedom of peaceful assembly as guaranteed by Article 11 (Art. 11) of the Convention.

Article 11 (Art. 11) of the Convention provides:

"1. Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and to freedom of association with others, ...

2. No restrictions shall be placed on the exercise of these rights other than such as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. ..."

The Commission considers that the right to freedom of peaceful assembly is secured to everyone who organises or participates in a peaceful demonstration. The notion of "peaceful assembly" does not, however, cover a demonstration where the organisers and participants have violent intentions which result in public disorder (cf. No. 8440/78, Dec. 16.7.80, D.R. 21 p. 138).

In the present case, the Commission notes that the demonstration on 12 December 1982 in front of the Stuttgart barracks of the US forces had not been notified under the relevant provisions of the German Assembly Act. The peace groups organising the demonstration and the participants, including the applicant, intended to demonstrate in particular by means of repeated sit-ins blocking the approach road to the barracks concerned and did thereby act illegally.

However, the Commission finds that the right to freedom of peaceful assembly is one of the foundations of a democratic society (No. 8191/78, Dec. 10.10.79, D.R. 17 p. 93) and should not be interpreted restrictively. The applicant and the other demonstrators had not been actively violent in the course of the sit-in concerned. The Commission accepts that the applicant's conviction under S. 240 of the Criminal Code interfered with his right under Article 11 para. 1 (Art. 11-1) and needs to be justified as a restriction prescribed by law and necessary in a democratic society for one of the purposes set out in Article 11 para. 2 (Art. 11-2) of the Convention.

The Commission, referring to its findings as regards the applicant's complaint under Article 7 para. 1 (Art. 7-1) of the Convention, considers that his conviction for attempted coercion within the meaning of S. 240 of the Criminal Code was a restriction on his right to freedom of peaceful assembly, prescribed by German law.

Furthermore, the Commission finds that, in the circumstances of the present case, the applicant's conviction for having participated in a sit-in can reasonably be considered as necessary in a democractic society for the prevention of disorder and crime. In this respect, the Commission considers especially that the applicant had not been punished for his participation in the demonstration of 12 December 1982 as such, but for particular behaviour in the course of the demonstration, namely the blocking of a public road, thereby causing more obstruction than would normally arise from the exercise of the right of peaceful assembly. The applicant and the other demonstrators had thereby intended to attract broader public attention to their political opinions concerning nuclear armament. However, balancing the public interest in the prevention of disorder and the interest of the applicant and the other demonstrators in choosing the particular form of a sit-in, the applicant's conviction for the criminal offence of unlawful coercion does not appear disproportionate to the aims pursued.

It follows that this part of the application is also manifestly ill-founded within the meaning of Article 27 para. 2 (Art. 27-2) of the Convention.

3. The applicant moreover complains under Article 11 (Art. 11) of the Convention of the police measures taken on 12 December 1982 to disperse the sit-in in which he participated.

The Commission notes that the applicant instituted administrative court proceedings against the cost order of the Stuttgart II Police Department concerning the police action on the occasion of the demonstration in question, in the course of which the Stuttgart Administrative Court found that the police action, i.e. the order that the demonstration be dispersed, had been unlawful. The Administrative Court, therefore, quashed the cost order.

The Commission considers that the applicant, under such circumstances, has not shown any legal interest to have the dispersal of the demonstration of 12 December 1982 examined by the Commission under Article 11 para. 1 (Art. 11-1) of the Convention. Accordingly, he cannot, in this respect, claim under Article 25 (Art. 25) of the Convention to be a victim of a violation of his rights under the Convention.

This part of the application is, therefore, incompatible ratione personae with the Convention within the meaning of Article 27 para. 2 (Art. 27-2) of the Convention.

4. Moreover, the applicant complains under Article 14 (Art. 14) in conjunction with Article 11 (Art. 11) of the Convention in respect of the above complaints. However, the Commission finds no appearance of discriminatory treatment in the circumstances of the present case. This part of the application is, therefore, manifestly ill-founded within the meaning of Article 27 para. 2 (Art. 27-2) of the Convention.

For these reasons, the Commission
